Bitcoin Holds $5,000 Level After New Position Uptrend

Since bursting higher above the $5,000 mark in early April, Bitcoin has managed to hold onto those gains leaving the world's leading decentralized digital currency trading above a new key psychological area of support. Year-to-date, Bitcoin has risen 34%, much more than the "historic" 20% YTD return of the Nasdaq and more than twice the return of the S&P 500's 16% YTD gains. While we don't expect Bitcoin's price to rise higher in a straight line, we do expect more gains ahead in 2019 and beyond. # VIDEO: Cryptocurrency Investing 101

In this fascinating and very exciting presentation, economist and trading coach Jerry Robinson explores the current paradigm shift with the advent of blockchain technology and Bitcoin, and why this offers potentially explosive long-term profits for investors. And later, he escorts members on a simple walkthrough of how to buy their first cryptocurrency.

Coinbase Rolls Out Visa Debit Card Tied to Crypto Balance

Until now, spending your cryptocurrency in the real world has been rather difficult. That changed last week when Coinbase announced the roll out of its new Coinbase Card, a Visa debit card that lets Coinbase customers spend their cryptocurrency balance anywhere Visa is accepted by automatically converting crypto to fiat currency at the point of sale. Currently, this new service is only available in the UK, but more European countries will soon be supported. (Coinbase)

U.S. Inflation Rate Surges to 1.9%; Complicates Fed Plans

Just weeks after the Federal Reserve rushed to calm investor fears by publicly downplaying any planned interest rate hikes for 2019, the official March inflation rate popped back up to near 2%, its highest level since last December. If the official inflation rate continues rising back to its previous 2018 levels, the Fed will be forced to relaunch its interest rate-hike campaign, which could spark another investor tantrum. The Fed will be watching this metric very closely in the coming weeks, as will investors.

Desperate College Students Become Equity Investments

If you thought that the $1.5 trillion student loan bubble was a problem, just wait until you hear Wall Street's latest scheme. Last week, Bloomberg released a stunning piece on how Wall Street is helping college students dig themselves deeper into debt through new "income-sharing agreements", in which students sell a percentage of their future occupational earnings to investors in exchange for upfront capital. In essence, indebted college students are now becoming stock investments for the rich in a whole new way. Read the story here (Bloomberg)

NEW PODCAST: Lessons From The World's Greatest Stock Traders

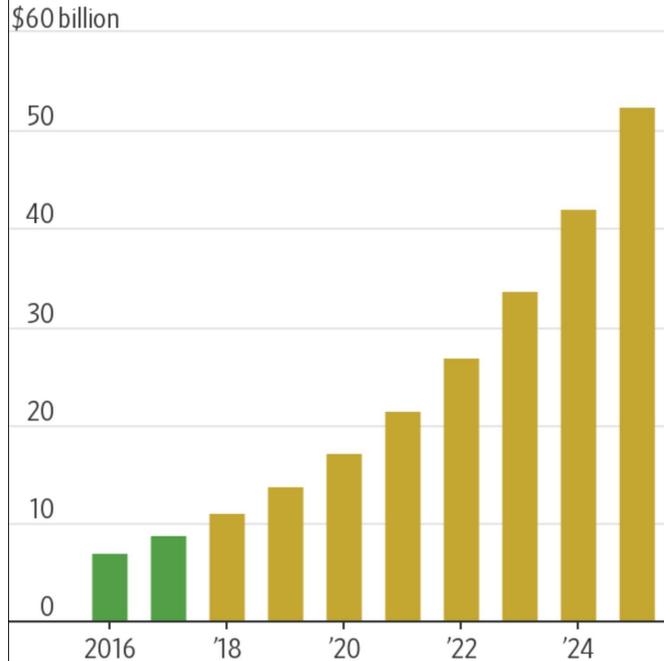

On this week's podcast, listen as Jerry Robinson delivers a rare presentation on the lessons that he has learned from five of the world's greatest stock traders. We reach into our vast archives to bring you an excerpt from a powerful foundational teaching recorded at our 2018 Follow The Money Summit.

S&P 500 Index - Commentary

The S&P 500 index remains in a confirmed Position uptrend and is now supported by a new Long-Term uptrend, which recently confirmed. The S&P 500 rose 0.55% last week as the index inched closer towards a new all-time high. With the index now trading above 2900, it sits just 0.8% below its former all-time high set back in late September 2018. Earnings season got off to a decent start last week with America's largest bank, JP Morgan (JPM), posting its best Q1 profits ever. Next week holds a slew of earnings releases that could prove to be market-moving including reports by Netflix, Goldman Sachs, Johnson & Johnson, PepsiCo, and many more. With many analysts lowering their expectations for Q1 earnings, many will be watching this week's earnings releases closely to see if those forecasts are indeed accurate. With the S&P 500 in a confirmed Position & Long-term uptrends, the path of least resistance remains higher from here. A breakout above $2940, which was the former all-time high...
